Clutch Coat Style Keeps Hands Occupied

By BETTY STAPLETON
 Society Editor

Canadian women will have to budget for two coats in their winter wardrobe this year. Of course, if last year's still wearable it can be used for unstylish activities like driving the children to school and making the rounds of the local supermarket. But according to styles seen last evening at the Toronto Fashion Council's showing at the King Edward the wrap-around silhouette will be seen on all other occasions.

To keep this clutch coat in fashionable line requires the use of both the wearer's hands most of the time.

Versions of this silhouette vary in shoulder and sleeve tapering but in the main it is one of width at the top and back fullness caught into a shoulder line yoke can achieve this inverted pyramid look.

35 mph U.S.-Style Means 55

The cab driver had just returned from the U.S., and was commenting on the lack of 30 mph zones among other differences in traffic. "I was going across Brooklyn bridge, where the entrance bore a sign saying, 'speed limit, 35 mph,' and that's what I was doing, though everybody was whizzing past me at better than 50. Suddenly, a traffic cop shouted, 'Is that all the speed that thing's got, Canada?' so when I roared up to 55 mph, he seemed to be happy."

"Yes, sir" was the reply, "but I graduated from the school two years ago."

Sound Advice

A young lady who spent her vacation at home in Kaslo, B.C., during blueberry picking time made no bones about being afraid of meeting a bear when on these excursions. Even though her mother was afraid too, she boasted that she was not. Asking her mother what she would do if she discovered a bear picking berries off the same bush, she said, "I'd say, 'I've got just as much right here as you have.' When the young lady arrived back in Toronto, one of the first news items that met her eye was an editorial advising berry pickers what to do on meeting a bear. The advice was—stand perfectly still and talk in a conversational tone."

Having religiously mailed a Star Weekly to a brother-in-law in Suffolk for the past five years, a constant reader was rewarded to learn that The Weekly goes the rounds of the family in Suffolk, then to other relations in Norfolk, and finally to a private school for boys, where it is used by the staff for purposes of teaching what we here designate as current events.
